THE JRPG ENGINE — THEME OVERVIEW

The Japanese RPG is the most intimate form of video game storytelling ever invented. The party, the overworld, the save point, the limit break — these are not game mechanics. They are a vocabulary of human experience: the people you find who join your journey, the moment you need to rest before you can go on, the inner reserve you didn't know you had, the side path that turns out to matter most.

Self-care speaks JRPG. The practice-builder has a party (therapist, sponsor, friend, community). The practice-builder has a save point (the journal, the check-in, the ritual). The practice-builder has random encounters (the unexpected hard day) and a limit break (the moment of extraordinary effort that surprises even them). The overworld is the bigger picture you can only see when you're not inside the dungeon.

These badges are for the players.

FLAVOR TEXT — THE JRPG ENGINE

> "The overworld is not the destination — it's the moment between destinations, when > you can see the whole map and choose. Self-care has overworld moments. Journal > entries are overworld moments. The check-in is the overworld. You are zoomed out, > choosing the next step."

> "A party is not a group of people who are good at the same things. A party is a > group of people who are good at different things. The healer needs the fighter.
> The mage needs the thief. You need your party. They need you."

> "The limit break triggers when the HP bar is low — when the character has been > pushed to their limit. Self-care knows this too. The extraordinary effort comes > from the broken place. The phoenix down is for after. The limit break is for during."

> "EarthBound was released in 1994. A boy named Ness fights a cosmic entity called > Giygas — the embodiment of evil so ancient it has no form, only feeling. He > defeats it not with power but with the prayers of everyone who loved him.

> The oldest JRPG lesson: you cannot fight it alone."

> "New Game Plus. You've finished the journey. You know where the save points are.

> You know which side quests matter. You start again with everything you earned.

> The next journey is not the same as the first — it's better."
